Borderline Personality Disorder (BPD) is a complex mental disorder that affects people’s thoughts, emotions and behaviours, making it difficult to cope in all areas of life.

The core features of BPD are intense, uncontrollable emotions, a pattern of troublesome relationships and a disturbed sense of self or identity. People with BPD may appear to lead chaotic lives, act impulsively or intentionally harm themselves as a method of coping.

BPD can be difficult for other people to understand, and people with this disorder are often unfairly stigmatised. Even the name can be confusing, as it was originally named because the symptoms seemed to be ‘on the border’ between psychotic and neurotic disorders.

However, many health professionals agree it needs a more appropriate name. Some people who have this disorder have said they would prefer to be known as having a highly sensitive soul, and more often than not BPD is associated with Complex Trauma.

Supporting someone with a personality disorder can be a challenging experience.

Sometimes there is an initial shock when you first learn of their problem and you may find it difficult to make sense of your own feelings. Other times it is a relief to know what the problem is, because it has been around for a long time without proper treatment. In fact, the whole experience can be overwhelming and may bring up many questions and sometimes even fewer answers. This is not an unfamiliar experience. Many others have described feeling this way.

ARAFMI understands the dynamics of caring for a person with a mental illness. ARAFMI is a service striving to support carers and the specific support needs of family members, in order to reduce the potential negative impact of the illness and promote mental health and wellbeing.
